

Safeguard Salutes Utility Linemen and Telecom Workers

Utility linemen and telecom workers face extreme danger every day. Exposure to high voltage and perilous heights are common safety concerns, but right now they also face all the dangers and uncertainties of the global coronavirus pandemic.

Whether they're repairing the cell towers that enable Zoom calls or maintaining the power grids that sustain ICUs, linemen and telecom workers are more important than ever right now. Worker safety and wellbeing will always be Safeguard's top priority, so we'd like to say thanks to these brave citizens for going above and beyond during the ongoing crisis.

Linemen and telecom workers keep the power and data flowing that enables our society to function. In order to accomplish this task, they are bound by an unwritten code of trusting, counting on each other to survive hazardous working conditions for society's benefit. Safeguard wants to recognize their gallant work to keep the lights on.

If you know a lineman or utility worker whose everyday heroism deserves to be recognized, nominate them by visiting Safeguard Equipment on Facebook, LinkedIn, Twitter, or Instagram. We will reach out to as many nominees as possible and do our best to make their life safer and a little easier. We will publish their stories and provide them with a token of our appreciation on behalf of all us for doing amazing jobs to keep us together as a nation. To help insure they safety we'll provide Safeguard's Compass a Personal Voltage and Current Detector. It will alert them to the presence of active voltage and current long before they are in harm's way. The protection offered by this safety device has significantly improved with the advent of 21st century digital technology. Its reliability has made Compass an essential piece of safety equipment. Linemen can now be proactive rather than reactive to worksite electrical threats.

As a personal show of our collective gratitude we'll provide each selected nominee with gift certificates for Domino's Pizza, Starbucks and Amazon.

These are challenging times, but we're powering through together.
